

Attic Answer #1

For Christians, how important is the issue of the relationship between science and theology?

The relationship of science and theology is of utmost importance for the Christian in the Post Modern age. We have descended to the point where these concepts are not permitted to overlap in any shape or form. This dynamic is evil, plain and simple. The disciplines of history, philosophy, ethics, science, theology, anthropology, sociology, etc. all inform one another. To segregate these ideas is simply counterproductive to understanding the universe and our place in it. So, it is of critical importance that Christian thinkers can show the beauty and majesty that does indeed exist among theology and science as well as all the aforementioned disciplines. If we are able to properly harmonize these concepts into a cohesive system which people adopt as a way of evaluating the world around them, then society can and will change as a result for the good of the Kingdom of God.
